Dear RefineM,

I hope you all had a wonderful holiday! Hope everybody is ready to start fresh with new goals for the new year. Make sure to check out the top five trends in project management in 2014, which is posted below. The article will hopefully make your goals become a reality. As I start my new year, a question comes to mind - what kind of support do project managers get from their organizations in order to deliver projects successfully? In the middle of increased demands, do they have enough support to be successful? I need your input. Please take a survey to share your views. I'll publish the results in next month's newsletter.

Once again wishing you a very happy new year.

2014 Project Management Trends

2013 has come to a close, and 2014 is just getting started. As we celebrate the new year, we look to the future, examining the discussions in the project management field about what changes might be coming this year and how they will impact project management. The main factors driving change will likely be economic conditions and increasing availability of technology to change the way businesses conduct their projects. With these changes, project managers will have to adapt, but also stay true to their proven methods, to guide project success.
